Item of Form (identify)	Answer
9.E.	Advisor will usually purchase, sell and hold similar or identical securities as clients. While transactions are not always at the same time, Advisor does not make transactions for himself shortly before those for clients. Advisor may purchase for himself securities that he believes are inappropriate for clients or perhaps use margin or short sells. If Advisor already owns a security that he believes is currently appropriate for clients, he will disclose such ownership before initiating transactions for clients. When entering or exiting an investment position Advisor will rotate the client order entry if transactions orders are being made individually. If orders are bunched or block traded the allocation will correspond to the amount of capital available for investment in accounts managed by Advisor, including his own. If individual limit orders are used Advisor will enter his own transactions last, but he will have no control over the order in which transactions occur.
10.	There is no minimum investment, but due to the flat $100 dollar fee accounts under $10,000 or $20,000 are less practical.
12.B.	Advisor is contractually precluded from buying on margin or investing in any derivative that requires margin or has a predetermined expiration date. The ban on margin purchase limits the amount of securities that might be bought for a client's account. Advisor recommends TD Ameritrade as the broker and custodian for account because of their low commissions and efficient order processing for clients and their low cost structure for Advisor. Advisor receives no compensation, from TD Ameritrade for having clients use their brokerage service. Any commissions paid by client to TD Ameritrade are at the companies standard rate.
